LIBRARY AUDIT

A library audit is a systematic and thorough examination of a library's resources, services, and operations to assess their efficiency, effectiveness, and adherence to established standards. The purpose of a library audit is to ensure that the library is functioning optimally, providing high-quality services to its users, and managing its resources responsibly.

The audit typically involves evaluating various aspects of the library, including the collection of books and materials, the use of library space, financial management, and the implementation of policies and procedures. It also looks at the performance of library staff, the effectiveness of technology like library management systems (e.g., M-OPAC), and user satisfaction. The audit helps identify strengths and areas for improvement, ensuring that the library remains aligned with its goals and effectively supports the academic and research needs of its community.

The audit is generally held in the month of March, every year. After completing the audit, recommendations are often provided to enhance resource allocation, improve services, and address any shortcomings. Regular library audits are essential for maintaining transparency, accountability, and continuous improvement within the library's operations.
